This advisory summarizes topics a residential seller is usually asked to think about when listing a property. It is written for demonstration purposes and does not replace legal advice or the statutory disclosure forms themselves. Seller is encouraged to read each section and to ask questions before signing the acknowledgment on page 2.

1. Duty to disclose

A seller must disclose material facts the seller knows about the property — things a reasonable buyer would want to know — whether or not the buyer asks. Known leaks, cracks, pest activity, unpermitted work, disputes over boundaries, and planned assessments are typical examples. Silence about a known material fact can create liability later; disclosure is the protection.

2. Limits of professional expertise

A real estate licensee is not an attorney, engineer, accountant, or home inspector. Brokers and agents may explain customary practice and hand over forms, but they do not interpret contracts, structural reports, or tax consequences for the seller. Sellers should engage their own professionals for those questions.

3. Inspections and investigation

Buyers will usually order their own inspections and may ask for repair estimates or receipts. Sellers benefit from having service records, permit histories, and prior repair documentation organized before the property goes on the market. Providing records the seller already has is helpful; volunteering opinions the seller cannot document is not.

4. Title, liens and possession

The seller should expect the buyer's title company to search the property's record history for deeds of trust, mechanic's liens, easements, and assessment liens. Items that should be paid off at closing must be arranged through escrow. Occupancy after closing, pending leases, and personal property left behind should all be stated in writing.

5. Acknowledgment

Seller acknowledges that the advisory was provided, that Seller had the opportunity to ask questions, and that Seller will complete the statutory disclosure forms to the best of Seller's knowledge. Acknowledgment of this advisory is not an admission of any defect.
